History

The French Revolution Pamphlets Collection was purchased in 1973 from Mrs. Frances Reynolds. It was originally acquired by Ball State University to assist an increasing number of history and French students in their research and studies. It was also purchased in the hopes that Ball State's Ph.D. program in History would be approved in the same year. It was meant to be a foundation for research in the field of modern Europe. At the time of acquisition, Dr. Richard Wires, chairman of the Department of History, wrote in support of the purchase, stating "... we have an increasing number of students who do work in this period for History and French credit and such source material is extremely valuable for their research and studies." Though the Ph.D. program never came to fruition, the French Revolution Pamphlet Collection remains an important resource for students and researchers.

The effects of the French Revolution were far reaching and global. The resulting wars propelled Britain to global dominance. France's navy was in shambles and its empire lost. Spain and Holland were broken as imperial powers. Radical ideas on rights, citizenship, and role of the state developed. The revolution heavily influenced conceptions of liberty and democracy. It also promoted nationalism and citizenship. Many historians consider the French Revolution as the beginning of Modern Europe.

The example of the American Revolution and the growth of new ideas amongst the Bourgeoisie began to stir up revolutionary ideas among the French. The ideals of the "Age of Enlightenment," led by Voltaire and Rousseau, which emphasized individual personal freedom, became a major influence in France. They presented an idea of a liberal society that flourished under a free-market economy. These thinkers also challenged the absolute right to rule and presented ideas of equal rights and the abolition of the class system. The pamphlets presented many of these ideas and played a crucial role in the birth of one of the world's most important revolutions.

The French Revolution, much like the American Revolution, was a movement of the masses. The North American Colonies and their revolt in the 1770s relied heavily on newspapers to promote, proselytize, and disseminate the political discourse that supported their war for independence. The French case presented a different picture, as newspapers were heavily censored in France. French revolutionaries thus turned to the pamphlet, which could be privately printed, as the most popular way to disseminate political discourse. An increase in the number of print shops and a rise in literacy allowed pamphlets to be both mass-produced and understood by the masses. Pamphlets became the most important tool of political polemics and propaganda.

Scope and Content

This collection of pamphlets covers numerous topics over a thirty-five year period. Its particular strength lies in the early years between 1789 and 1793. Its major topics include laws, taxes, trade, rights, the judicial system, the creation of the constitution, the army, the church, and the execution of the king. Included in this collection is the Déclaration que S.A.S. le Duc régnant de Brunswick-Lunebourg. This pamphlet is the the Proclamation of the Duke of Brunswick, which was the primary justification for the downfall of the monarchy and the eventual execution of the king. Among the more interesting pamphlets surrounding the debate over Louis XVI's execution is the three act tragedy entitled La Mort de Louis XVI, written by an anonymous royalist. One of the most fascinating literary pamphlets we have is Marie-Joseph Chénier's Charles IX, ou L'école des Rois, tragédie which attacked the state's use of censorship. There are also works by a large number of important people. These include Jean Sylvain de Bailly, Napoleon Bonaparte, Jacques Pierre Brissot, Armand Gaston Camus, Lazare Carnot, Trophime Gerard, Marquis de Lally-Tollendal, Honoré Gabriel Riquetti, Count of Mirabeau, Jacques Necker, Maximilien Robespierre, Emmanuel Joseph Sieyès, and Jerome Pétion de Villenere.
